

Interpersonal relationships

.... remaining characteristics of Interpersonal relationships

Meshing

It refers to organization and interpretation of behaviour of two people with respect to one another. Most relationships are either complementary or symmetrical.

- Complementary relationships- When in a relationship one person's behaviour balances another is generally known as complementary relationships.

- Symmetrical relationships- A type of relationship in which one person's behaviour is nearly the same as other's.

Support

It occurs because of the actions of each partner taken for the well being of the other person in a relationship. It can take different forms- psychological, emotional, physical etc.

Anxiety reduction

Overcoming stress and fear is anxiety reduction. In its true sense, it is a type of emotional support. It is an attempt to reduce other person's fear and anxiety. Lastly, it is making someone more comfortable or less stressful.

Proximity

It is the physical distance between the individuals in a relationship. A person is more likely to communicate and establish a relationship with another person who is physically close than to a person who is physically far away.

